To Whom It May Concern:

Hannah Charlesworth interned for me at Future House Publishing during the Fall and Winter of 2016-2017. Due to her excellent qualifications and character, I would like to recommend her for employment.

Future House Publishing takes on student interns in order to provide them with work experience and grow our Science Fiction, Fantasy and Children's Book publishing business. Publishing requires many new skill sets that a student of any college usually does not have. Hannah was able to climb the steep learning curve and contribute to our organization in a way that most interns are never able to achieve.

Hannah did the research and executed the tasks for the following: wrote press releases, submitted our books for awards across the nation, learned email marketing software and best practices, prepared email marketing campaigns, reached out to authors for cross-promotion activities and led those efforts.

Often interns pepper me with questions they could easily answer for themselves, like "What email should I send this to?" instead of looking it up in our database or searching google. Hannah never had this problem. She was extremely valuable because I was able to give her a task that was sometimes ill-defined, and she would take responsibility for it then complete it with little supervision.

One of her biggest wins for Future House was a press release she wrote and sent to Publishers Weekly that resulted in a national article for us and greater recognition in our industry. We had several new meetings and phone calls with partners that we otherwise would not have had, all thanks to Hannah.

I highly recommend her for any employment due to her proactive nature, her ability to learn and execute, and most of all, her impeccable character.

Sincerely,

Adam Sidwell
